Executive Summary

Diaspora has historically played a significant role in the developments in their countries, and in inter-community and inter-state dynamics, be that through political influence and lobbying or through intellectual and economic capacity, including through remittances. However, diaspora communities of different ethnic backgrounds have predominantly developed rivalries than contacts and cooperation. A key factor is that large diaspora communities from the Western Balkans (WB) region left their countries due to wars/conflicts. This has largely shaped their attitudes and perceptions towards each other. Inter-diaspora contacts are primarily established on individual and professional basis rather than on institutional, for example between different associations (business, cultural, political, lobby groups, etc.). The role and potential (intellectual, political, economic) of diaspora is enormous therefore countries of the region have developed specific policies and laws to utilize their potential. Yet, there is no regional strategy that aims at minimum to establish inter-diaspora connection and dialogue.

Several political, social, and economic factors have shaped the Western Balkans (WB) diaspora, creating a diverse group of people with regard to thought, motivation, and engagement. Historically, in particular with reference to four major waves of emigration during the last century, people left for reasons of economy or war. Nowadays, the main 'drivers' are social and economic inequality, labour demand, a changing demographics in the region, which are encouraging people to leave their homes in search of a better life. A considerable proportion of diaspora keep close ties with their homelands, and are active in preserving their tradition, culture, and values. They do this by establishing or engaging with cultural, educational, political and other forms of associations in their host countries.

Diaspora can assist in the development of their countries of origin, helping to reduce poverty and promote new economic activity and employment through direct or indirect investments, such as the establishment of new businesses and trading networks, tourism activities and consumption.

WB is still dealing with the consequences of recent wars and transition of post-socialist economy, which have also influenced diaspora policies. Despite these challenges, countries have adopted laws, established institutional bodies, and enacted projects related to the diaspora. The approach so far has largely focused on what diaspora has to offer, and not vice versa. Some of these policies have also attempted to address the "brain drain" or the "loss" of skilled and qualified people to more developed countries. A key challenge for WB countries is to turn brain drain into brain gain by also creating channels for the transfer of intellectual remittances back to the region which needs to become a ceaseless priority for WB countries.

WB countries are yet to reap the benefits and potentials of inter-diaspora initiatives and projects, those that aim to not only fuel economic development, but to contribute to the reconciling ethnic divisions and reaching EU aspirations. Cross-regional cooperation with and between WB diasporas needs to feature highly on the agenda of relevant authorities of the countries of the region as it can contribute to tackling current challenges and offer alternative solutions.

1. Introduction

In recent decades, the WB has experienced tectonic shifts in the political and socio-economic landscape, leading to mass emigration and in turn establishing substantial diasporas in Europe and beyond. Engaging diasporas is being recognised increasingly as an important issue worldwide, and this will inevitably become more relevant, seeing as international migration already constitute pillars of politics and society across the globe. Diaspora communities are involved in various socio-economic and political activities and programmes, such as lobbying, remittances or personal participation, all of which have the potential to impact home countries' decision-making processes.

This briefing looks into the role, influence potential, intellectual and financial capital of the WB diasporas to inform larger policies for relationship-building among diverse diaspora communities, and to encourage them to have a greater role in advancing democracy and socio-economic development in their country of origin and in the WB region. It primarily focuses on Western Balkans Six (WB6) which refers to Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Kosovo, Montenegro, North Macedonia and Serbia. References to Croatia and Greece, as two EU member states, are used to illustrate and as appropriate compare the data with WB countries which aspire to gain full EU membership in the future.

It begins with a short historical perspective, to give context about their background, their role, influence and related challenges. It then provides a list of major projects and activities that may assist in engaging them and thereby reducing the "brain drain". It ends with conclusions, followed by Annex 1 which provides further country-by-country detail on key government institutions and policies, including illustrative data on WB diasporas as well as prominent diaspora organisations in the EU, US and other countries.

This briefing draws on limited desk-research further complemented by views and insights of the participants who attended the Inter-Diaspora Roundtable "Looking up: discussion on the Balkan region", held in Berlin, Germany on 25 February 2020. However its primary purpose is to encourage constructive dialogue, collaborative action, and comprehensive research and analysis on this highly complex topic of WB diaspora which particularly seek to identify positive examples of inter-diaspora cooperation that has taken place and/or recorded at any point in history, so that we can build on and work to help advance a more just, sustainable, and peaceful WB region.

2. Historical Background

To better understand the WB diasporas and their influence, it is needed to give a brief description of the political, social, and economic factors that have shaped them. The diaspora is not a homogenous group, rather representing a diversity of thought, motivation, and engagement, and thus cannot be represented by a singular or fixed voice. For the purposes of this briefing, four key waves of migration are highlighted below.

- The first wave dates back to the Balkan wars (1912-1913), which did not contribute to an established diaspora since many returned:
- The second wave came after the end of World War II (WWII), also driven by political-ideological motivations. Most immigrants were political dissidents who did not support the newly established communist regime;
- Post WWII Europe needed a labour force, fuelling the third wave in the 1960s. At that time, the borders were opened for temporary workers and by 1973, there were more than one million immigrants from the then Yugoslavia recorded in Western Europe:

• The fourth wave followed the wars of the 1990s, when over 4 million refugees were forced to flee. Of Kosovo's diaspora, over 55 per cent emigrated between 1990 and 1999, before and during the Kosovo war. Albania experienced a mass wave of emigration after the fall of communism in the 1990s. The tragic events in WB were somewhat overshadowed by another, rather economic, factor: the transition from a state-driven economy to that of a market-driven one. This shift rendered institutions ill-equipped and encouraged people to leave their countries of origin, as the alternative was the lack of sustainable socio-economic development, perceived as limiting the ability to obtain decent work, health care or education. The most affected social group was youth, as their potential to gain high-quality education and well-paid jobs elsewhere made them eager to escape from their circumstances.

Nowadays, the main 'drivers' of emigration from the region include social and economic inequality, demand for labour, and changes in demography. People are leaving their homelands in search of a better life. The countries of WB are still trying to rebuild themselves in a challenging post-war and post socialist economic environment.

At the end of 2013, 5.7 million persons originating from the Western Balkans lived abroad, bringing the emigration rate at 31.2%. According to 2008/2009 OECD research, Serbia alone saw 30,000 citizens leave annually. Further illustrating the situation, approximately every third citizen of Kosovo lives abroad. Switzerland, Austria, and Germany were the destinations for most citizens from Serbia, Kosovo, and Bosnia and Herzegovina, whereas citizens of Albania gravitated more towards Greece and Italy (see estimates in table 1 below).

Albania's National Strategy on migration and action plan 2019 – 2022<sup>2</sup>, indicates that women and young people are two groups facing the most difficulties when engaging in the local labour market, thus tending to seek opportunities abroad. This strategy makes a reference to five factors estimated to currently influence emigration: work opportunities abroad, family reunification, unemployment rates in Albania, study opportunities abroad and other factors. In a 2018 survey<sup>3</sup>, citizens of Croatia named corruption as the primary reason for leaving their country, followed by nationalism, among others.

These examples show that differing motives and circumstances have pushed citizens to leave their native countries in the WB in recent history.

3. Influence and Organization

A considerable proportion of WB diaspora, despite having fully integrated into their host countries, remain nostalgic about the culture, tradition, and language of their countries of origin. They are active in preserving these values by forming and joining various cultural, educational, political and other associations. This is one way to keep ties with their home countries, with diaspora contributing positively to the development of the host and home countries, economically and politically. Research suggests that migration can improve development in origin countries, with diaspora helping to reduce poverty through direct or indirect investments, such as the establishment of new businesses and trading networks, tourism activities and consumption, promoting new economic activity and employment.

One form of diaspora contribution is seen primarily in the delivery of large sums of remittances to home countries, which is an example of strong emotional ties and connections to home countries, but also the moral obligation felt by the diaspora to support friends and family, and to invest in the development of their home countries. As of 2015, the remittance flow has been sizable: the entire region received 8.6 billion USD, ranging from 3.1% of GDP in North Macedonia to 16.7% in Kosovo. 10 This puts diasporas in powerful political position. Data in table 2 below indicate the remittance inflows in the recent years.

However, participants at the roundtable in Berlin cautioned that diaspora carries a notion of finance which is frequently being associated solely with monetary benefits, and that governments exploit diaspora communities for their political gains and influence, and for advancing their political and/or nationalist agendas. Less so utilizing the potential of diaspora as a bridge between countries of origin and of residence, and to bring knowledge and expertise to the region.

Diaspora investment in countries of origin is multidimensional and can be driven by individuals or families, and through formal or informal networks, with its mobilisation assuming various forms of financial and human capital, such as remittances, direct investments, philanthropy, and tourism. Other forms include knowledge transfer through the sharing of learnt skills and ideas, both in social and business circles. These forms of non-economic investment are just as important to development as the financial investments. For example, people with highly educated compatriots tend to follow a similar path and work towards completing a higher education degree. This inevitably leads to a more competent workforce and thus creates greater economic potential in the development of the country of origin. There are numerous examples of this kind that show positive contribution to the overall development of origin countries. The diaspora has the opportunity to acquire specialised knowledge and skills that can strengthen industries in their home countries, if they decide to return there. For instance, Albania's immigrants who later return home are the more likely to start a business than those who never left the country <sup>11</sup>. In light of this, policies aimed at mobilising the diaspora are also multidimensional, seeking to secure, not only remittances and direct investments, but to share human and social capital as well.

WB diaspora, like other diaspora, have organized themselves around political, cultural, and religious ideas. Due to a diverse range of associations, it can be hard to create a horizontal organizational setup. One example is the Macedonian umbrella association "United Macedonian Diaspora", which claims to be the sole representative of all Macedonian diaspora abroad. This claim was disputed by the Minister without portfolio in the Republic of North Macedonia in charge of Diaspora Affairs during the ongoing negotiation process to reach the Prespa Agreement. The Minister stated that one diaspora association cannot represent all and each can work separately.

Diasporas have a long history of engaging in politics in diverse ways, not only through voting and representation in parliament, but also through lobbying in host countries, and by financially backing political parties and civil society organizations. Several WB countries have accepted an ethnically exclusive citizenship policy and then secured seats in parliament for diaspora representatives. In doing so, these countries displayed their belief in the importance of the contributions made by the diaspora to their origin countries. Prime examples of this are North Macedonia and Croatia, which have been criticized for the inclusion of their diaspora for the fact that they are staunch supporters of the ruling parties.

During the 1990s, the diaspora played a particularly important role in Kosovo, they financed its liberation, lobbied Western governments, and even directly participated in the war. For instance, the biggest political party back then, the Democratic League of Kosovo (LDK), managed to internationalize the conflict by opening party offices, including in Germany, Switzerland, Norway, the US, Canada and Albania. These offices were considered fundamental in the effort to organise political activities within diplomatic channels to effectively advocate for liberation and independence.

The diaspora still has political influence today. In the 2017 Kosovo parliamentary elections, on 11 June, the diaspora voted in higher numbers than in previous elections. While many voted via mail, a considerable proportion visited Kosovo to vote in person. Kosovo has also called for a similar initiative to reserve seats for diaspora members in its parliament. In contrast to other WB countries, more than 70 per cent of Kosovo's diaspora votes went to political parties that had not been in power for many years. While in North Macedonia, the diaspora played an important role in the wake of ongoing negotiation process to reach the Prespa Agreement.

Croatian diasporic communities eagerly celebrated the breakup of the former Yugoslav republic in 1992, and later, the official recognition of Croatia as an independent country. In Canada, for example, the Croatian community contributed to the cause both morally and financially, and took pride in celebrating its long-sought independence. Political organizing is also a distinctive quality of the Albania's diaspora, particularly of those based in Greece and Italy, with the creation of organizations based on the interests of political parties in Albania. They continue to play an important role in encouraging compatriots to travel to Albania to vote in elections. Some representatives involved in these political activities abroad are also members of the Albanian parliament, increasing the political influence of the diaspora in politics there.

4. Institutions And Policies

The following section provides a brief overview of each country's policies toward the diaspora. Further detail along with illustrative data and examples are provided in Annex 1 for each country.

4.1. Albania

Albania has adopted numerous legislative and administrative decisions to engage its diaspora, and has established several institutional bodies to promote and advance these ties, including the Subcommittee on Diaspora and Migration (part of Permanent Parliamentary Committee on Foreign Policy), the State Committee on Diaspora and the State Ministry of Diaspora. Apart from the institutional bodies and official strategic documents and legislation, the Government of Albania has also signed Memorandums of Understanding with several countries. Most notably, Albania has established The Albanian Diaspora Development Fund (ADDF) to provide funds and support diaspora investment in the country's economic, social, and cultural development.

The Albanian government organized Diaspora Summits in 2016 and 2019 to further foster the relationship between Albania and its Diaspora. These were an opportunity for Albanian diaspora from across the world to network and establish contacts. At these events, the Prime Minister of Albania also presented awards to high-profile diaspora for making significant contribution.<sup>12</sup> The government has set up other support mechanisms for the diaspora, including the Diaspora Business Office to support investors and the Diaspora Publishing House to support Albanian language learning.

4.2. Bosnia and Herzegovina (Bih)

The Government of the Federation of BiH has approved strategic documents in relation to the Diaspora, namely: Guide to the BiH Diaspora – How to protect investor rights in BiH; Guide to BiH Diaspora – How to exercise rights in BiH; Analysis of needs for training of employees in institutions in BiH at different levels of government for strengthening capacities for cooperation with expatriates and proposal of training plan; Recommendations for incorporating the concept of migration and development in the design and implementation of public policies in BiH; and Mapping the Bosnia-Herzegovina Diaspora.

According to the BiH Federal Government Policy on Cooperation with Diaspora, numerous legislative and administrative decisions have been made to target the diaspora. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs is directly responsible for BiH foreign policy and thus encouraging, developing, and coordinating cooperation with BiH émigrés through diplomatic and consular missions. The Ministry of Human Rights and Refugees, which also works with international organisations, has exclusive jurisdiction over creating diaspora policies, and its Diaspora Department operates over two sectors, that of Status and Information and that of Economic, Educational, Scientific and Cultural Cooperation. The BiH Ministry of Civil Affairs administers support and materials for the diaspora to learn Bosnian-Croatian-Serbian (BHS) language. With institutional cooperation with diaspora lacking at state level, and diaspora needs requiring multi-sectoral involvement, many issues are solved at the entity, cantonal and municipal levels.

4.3. Kosovo

Until early 2020, Kosovo had a Ministry of Diaspora, which has now been merged into the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Diaspora. A new law is currently being drafted. The previous Law on Diaspora aimed to preserve and cultivate national identity, language, culture and education of the diaspora members, and their relations with institutions of Republic of Kosovo. It also claimed to help with the organization of the diaspora in various countries where they live, and encourage and develop inter-cultural relations. Kosovo has created an online database to display estimates and communicate with its diaspora. Some political figures in Kosovo have expressed views to amend the constitution in order to create room for political inclusion of diaspora into the national parliament by reserving 5 seats out of 120.13

4.4. Montenegro

Montenegro interacts with its diaspora primarily via the Council for Cooperation with Diaspora. This is an advisory body to the government on strategies and laws of interest to the diaspora. It approves codes and rules of the council, and administers activities for the protection and promotion of the Montenegrin language, culture, and tradition. Council members include diaspora representatives from each country where citizens of Montenegro live abroad, proportional to the percentage of the diaspora in each country, as outlined in the 2018 Law on Cooperation of Montenegro with Diaspora Immigrants. There is also the Department of Diaspora, and the parliamentary Committee on International Relations and Immigrants. The latter monitors and approves proposals and initiatives for the adoption of laws and other acts within its scope of activities, and other issues under the obligations of the Parliament of Montenegro that relate to immigrants. The content of the country of the parliament of Montenegro that relate to immigrants.

4.5. North Macedonia

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of North Macedonia is in charge of coordinating institutional activity to enhance the cooperation with its diaspora. This ministry has approved a strategic document which envisages the state cooperation with its diaspora: The National Strategy of North Macedonia for Cooperation with Diaspora 2019-2023. This strategy aims to address the following matters: the mapping of the diaspora systematic acknowledgement of diaspora priorities, the establishment of a cooperation mechanism between the government and the diaspora, the acknowledgement of rights and obligations of diaspora in the political context; and the advancement of cultural, business and education cooperation between North Macedonia and its diaspora.<sup>15</sup>

4.6. Serbia

The Republic of Serbia has the Office for Cooperation with the Diaspora and Serbs in the Region within its Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA), which is responsible for diaspora matters. It performs public administration and professional activities set forth by the Law, including: preserving and developing the spiritual, national and cultural identity of Serbs outside the Republic of Serbia; improving ties between Diaspora, Serbian citizens living abroad and their organizations in Serbia, keeping diaspora informed about the policies of the Republic of Serbia, supporting the process of inclusion of diaspora into the political, economic and cultural life of the Republic of Serbia, and their return to the Republic of Serbia, among others. It also publishes a list of Serbian diaspora associations worldwide on the office's dedicated page. Until 2012, the Ministry of Religion and Diaspora was responsible for diaspora affairs, when it was amalgamated into the Ministry of Culture and Information. In 2014, the Serbian Parliament adopted the Law on the Diaspora and Serbs in the Region. This Law stipulates that the Assembly of the Diaspora and Serbs in the Region shall be the highest body of the diaspora and Serbs in the region, and that a Budget Fund and a Council for Diaspora should be established. To date, no concrete measures have been taken to establish these bodies, with alongside or to replace the Office for Cooperation with the Diaspora and Serbs in the region.

5. The Brain Drain

The "brain drain" here refers to the departure of academics, qualified individuals in various fields, and students studying at universities abroad. The "brains" of the WB countries are leaving for Canada, the United States, Germany and other EU member states, the United Kingdom, and other countries. The "loss" of qualified and educated citizens is detrimental to a country's socio-economic development, as these people are the driving force of any country. The best academics and businesspersons of the region tend to be found amongst the diaspora, having left to find better opportunities elsewhere. This inevitably leads to a brain drain in home countries. Even though there are ongoing efforts to bring back to the region the knowledge gained abroad and turn the brain drain into brain gain, these have not been very successful primarily due to the challenges to work with public institutions. The participants at the roundtable in Berlin voiced their concerns that the region is suffering from the brain drain (particularly youth emigration and exodus of medical staff), as statistics indicate that a large number of people are leaving their home countries in search for a better life

However, there were views that government institutions in the region (for example Albania) are seeking to recruit people who return to their home country after graduating from the universities abroad

The 2000s saw a surge in research into the WB diaspora as countries fought to combat the then newly publicized brain drain. Unfortunately, there is scarcity and conflicting data on the diaspora, mainly due to a lack of official registry data, leaving many countries to rely solely on statistics recorded by host countries and international organisations, or by their foreign missions which include only the diaspora who make contact. Not one of the WB countries in this briefing had published a definite number of diaspora, and the highest estimates can be more than double the lowest estimates.

This can be clearly observed in the fact that although the emigration to OECD member states has been fairly consistent over the last decade, the numbers of international students from Albania, Croatia, and Serbia have been on the rise between 2008 - 2012 (see Figure 2 (5.7) below).

This trend seems to have continued as the data on the figure below indicate

This situation has left countries wondering how to prevent education and work becoming only gateways to emigration, and their citizens, particularly the educated, from permanently moving abroad.

WB countries need to examine the best ways to harnessing the financial, political, and academic potential of the diaspora, and should seek new and enticing ways to engage the diasporas and to collect (and publicise) meaningful data. Having a highly educated and skilled diaspora poses an opportunity for a potential gain to the home country in the form of human capital. The challenge lies in mobilizing these brains in order to involve them in promoting the economic growth of the region, building a sustainable brain circulation petwork <sup>17</sup>

Simply put, how to turn the current brain drain into a brain gain?

Cooperation amongst the WB countries is crucial. The brain gain strategy should be twofold, focusing on both those who have left their countries of origin and on those who have remained. All WB countries have set objectives as to how to reap the benefits of their diaspora's potential to contribute to socio-economic development. From Croatia creating quotas for diaspora students in Croatian universities, to Montenegro and Serbia allocating funds to innovative diaspora projects, to North Macedonia supporting entrepreneurship between home-based and diasporic economic actors. These represent some good examples of how WB countries can gain traction in engaging their diasporas. All WB countries have formulated legal and political strategy documents that underpin their various diaspora-related programs and projects aimed at forging strong ties for improved socio-economic benefit.

Despite this progress, a lot remains to be done. Not only individual efforts by each country toward their diasporas, but also cross-regional efforts to effectively increase the diaspora contribution to socio-economic development, and to utilize the cross-regional approach with the diaspora to encourage greater regional cooperation between WB countries overall. All these endeavors need to rely on a sustainable and long-term strategies to promote and foster socio-economic growth and democratization in the region, leaving no way to corruption and nepotism, two of the main pitfalls that continue to hamper progress and serve as the main culprits for the long socio-economic status-quo of the countries of the region.<sup>18</sup>

It is the role of the policymakers to think collaboratively about what new strategies and policies could be implemented to improve the brain gain and brain circulation in the WB. It is vital to develop the region's competitiveness, and to focus on expanding the private sector and easing the administrative bureaucracy currently required to start a business. Supporting the creation of new businesses will improve investment opportunities, encourage further entrepreneurship, and positively impact the employment sectors.

6. Challenges to interacting with the Diaspora

While there may be several associations linked to the diaspora in each home country, regional cooperation has proven to be a challenge. This can be attributed to a number of factors. WB diasporas tend to be more culturally conservative than those back in their countries of origin, in a bid to maintain and not lose their identities, turning to the ideals and traditions that have shaped them. The WB is known for its political, ethnic and religious divisions and this can be even more prevalent among the different diasporic communities of the region. With religion being so tightly tied to identity and with the nationalistic rhetoric that often characterizes their political viewpoints, it can be a challenge to establish a functioning cross-regional diaspora cooperation. Members of one WB diaspora may hesitate to interact with members of the other regional diaspora, and there is a sense of isolation and even rivalry between the different diasporas. In Australia, this inter-diaspora rivalry<sup>19</sup> can be seen in the frequency of violent outbreaks that erupt during football matches between diaspora clubs, normally an unlikely occurrence in matches with other clubs. Although this rivalry is most observable in Serbo-Croatian diasporic relations and North Macedonia - Greece diasporic relations, it exists between other diasporic communities as well.

Religious institutions play a major role and have significant influence in some diaspora communities, including in pushing for certain political ideologies and narratives. Asking diasporic communities to work together with, to tolerate or to accept the groups of people they view as rivals, means there will be a dominant historical narrative of prejudice to contend with. The main challenge posed by the diaspora from North Macedonia is more to do with who they're willing to associate with as business and professional ties were found to be based upon "kin, identity and nationalistic" factors rather than business opportunities<sup>20</sup>. An indicator that they may place nationalistic allegiances above financial gain and therefore maybe some of the hardest to sway with initiatives for cooperation and reconciliation. Also, the rise of populism among the diaspora communities poses challenges to any realistic portrayal of old rivals and inter-diaspora cooperation. Another major challenge is the lack of reliable data on all WB diasporas, which is an obstacle to the development of effective policies and programs for them. The number, distribution, skills, prosperity, and level of integration of diaspora groups is essential for the creation of partnerships.

Nevertheless, there is hope that the situation will improve with more robust and innovative initiatives, backed by the good intentions of the WB countries and a diplomatic push by the international community, particularly the EU. And the following examples from the region demonstrate that relationship building and cooperation between diaspora communities of different backgrounds is possible despite the dominant divisive narratives and numerous/serious challenges:

- The Diaspora School<sup>21</sup> organized in Kosovo (11 15 October 2017), brought together young professionals (age 18-35) from Kosovo, the Diaspora and the Western Balkans region to connect, share knowledge, and create community solutions that address pressing issues at a local level.
- The First Regional Winter School<sup>22</sup> on "Diaspora for Local Development" held in Belgrade on 10-11 December 2019, also attended by researchers and representatives of government institutions and international organisations aimed to involve experts and practitioners from the Western Balkans to establish connections, exchange knowledge and learn from the others best practices of diaspora involvement in local development
- This first inter-diaspora roundtable "Looking up: Discussion on the Balkan region", held in Berlin on 25 February 2020, brought together actors from various backgrounds including academia, science, journalism and civil society. It offered space for fruitful and constructive discussions to identify areas for collective action in the future, to create momentum, and to tackle divergences and lack of cooperation between the diaspora communities.<sup>23</sup>

These and similar examples indicate that even though people have personal stories and experiences, and potentially different cultural backgrounds that define them, they are able to find common ground, solidarity and unity which remains crucial basis for better understanding and cooperation between the diaspora communities. They also show that members of diaspora communities together hold valuable potential, knowledge and skills, currently untapped due to a lack of communication and limited opportunities for cooperation

There is high potential to build on the existing and create new opportunities. There is the possibility for the diaspora communities to create a bridge between their country of residence and their country of origin, and connect a cultural chasm that is currently in place. Such examples also demonstrate that it is important that professionals share their experiences and are enabled to coherently transfer their knowledge and expertise. And that collective action is needed to identify actors, leaders and agents of change among the diaspora communities who are able and motivated to contribute. Therefore, it is fundamental to give a voice to members of the diaspora and create new opportunities for participation and collaboration through for example building networks based on common values and interests, and creating channels that enable intellectual wealth transfer and support for different professionals.

Gaining full membership into the EU is a common aspiration for WB countries and societies. Each WB country is at a different stage, with regional cooperation being one of the key pillars in advancing the accession process. By involving the countries' diaspora to build stronger cross-regional ties, this process would undoubtedly gain more traction and pave the way for a sustainable shift from the current situation.

7. Conclusion

Despite integrating into their host countries, the WB diasporas have kept close ties with their home countries. They have been active in preserving their culture, tradition, and language by organizing themselves within various cultural, educational, and political associations and, as a consequence, influencing policies in both home and host countries. They are a diverse group, holding onto rather conservative ideals and traditions, more so than people in countries of their origin, and with identities being built strongly around ethnicity and religion. The contributions made by the region's diaspora have been multidimensional, with support going towards financial and human capital, remittances, direct investment, philanthropy, and tourism to name a few.

WB countries are yet to harness the potential of inter-diaspora initiatives and projects, which not only fuel economic development but also contribute to ethnic reconciliation and achieving the EU aspirations of the region. Although the benefits of involving the diaspora to improve socio-economic conditions and advancing democracy in the region have long been acknowledged, the focus has always been to rely on what the diaspora has to offer, and not vice versa. While sizable amounts of money are sent to the region, WB countries are still in the process of finding solutions to effectively tackle the brain drain and to fully utilise the intellectual and financial capital of their diaspora. A challenge to this seems to be the scarcity and often conflicting data in the region. Robust data collection systems (including access and publication), are likely to improve the credibility of data and better inform future research, policies and interventions.

Numerous projects with the diaspora have been implemented and are continuing. Yet, the cross-regional diaspora cooperation needs to be put higher on the agenda of the relevant authorities of the WB countries. While people have personal stories and experiences, and potentially different cultural backgrounds that define them, it is possible to find common ground which remains crucial basis for improving mutual understanding and lowering barriers that eventually lead to solidarity and cooperation. When drafting strategies and policy documents, it is critical for each country to emphasise that regional cooperation must be improved as a precondition of the countries moving forward in their road to EU accession.

Note: It was not possible to identify data for Serbia's immigrants from a single credible source similar to the other five WB countries provided in this Annex. In the case of Serbia, it was common that research from various actors either cited the same sources but provided conflicting data, or the sources that were referenced where inaccessible.

Projects and Activities

Open Competition for Partially Financing projects

In 2018, the government of Serbia has allocated budget to fund around 100 projects for the Diaspora and for Serbs in the region.

Project "Serbia for the Serbs of the Region"

At the recommendation of the Ministry of Education, Science and Technological Development, in line with the Strategy of maintaining and strengthening relations between the mother country and diaspora, as well as between the mother country and the Serbs of the region, the Government of the Republic of Serbia has approved the Project "Serbia for the Serbs of the Region", providing scholarships for young people belonging to the Serbian ethnic communities in the countries of the region.

Blockchain-based Diaspora remittances in the city of Niš (2018)

UNDP Serbia designed this project to test how this type of advanced technology can be of use to the government, while making the financial transfer services cheaper, more transparent and tailored to citizen's needs. Most recently, the National Bank of Serbia fully endorsed the test to be conducted by UNDP, since the Bank itself has been planning to also test and potentially induce blockchain technologies for diaspora remittances.

Linking Serbian banks and Serbian Diaspora in Germany

As a result of a survey amongst Serbia's migrants in Germany, GIZ found out that neither do banks in Serbia target their potential diaspora customers specifically nor do the migrants have information about the banks' offerings. GIZ brought Serbian banks and other stakeholders into dialogue with Serbian migrant organizations and started a financial literacy campaign via a Serbian diaspora newspaper.

Serbian Diaspora Census project

First step towards the countrywide Census project realization was recently made in the Nišava District, the region surrounding City of Niš. The Census in Nišava District is organized by the Association for Diaspora Cooperation "Matica" with the support of the Directorate for Diaspora of the Serbian Foreign Affairs Ministry. The Diaspora Census aims to further strengthen the relationship between Serbia and Serbs who live abroad.

About The Balkan Forum

The Balkan Forum works to create a new vision for the Balkan region. It is a regional, multisector platform designed to advance cross-border dialogue and create a shared regional vision and agenda for cooperative action in the Balkan region based on economic integration, prosperity, and sustainable peace. We adopt a positive approach as the guiding principle for our activities; rather than re-emphasizing the problems that have divided the Balkan populations for many years now, we focus heavily on the positive elements that unite them

We highlight good practices of regional cooperation to policy discussions and promote existing efforts to connect grassroots initiatives, knowledge, and successes to the decision-making levels that are responsible for policymaking and regional and/or EU integration. Together with our partners we focus our efforts on filling gaps and mobilizing action; facilitating consensus building and dialogue; and building political will for policy action on regional cooperation initiatives.
